

in danger of committing mortgage fraud if you simply got a standard buy-to-let mortgage and then rented out the rooms without permission

I am not a mortgage advisor so am limited in the information I can give, but what I would say is go and find a good mortgage broker who knows their stuff when it comes to HMOs and multi-lets

I'm happy to give you the details of my broker if you email me at samuel@property-investors.co.uk

Tax implications

The more money you make, the more tax you will pay. It baffles me as to why people get so upset by having to pay taxes because as Jim Rohn says

If you want to walk on the pavement and not in the mud, then you need to “pay your taxes”

In 2016, the government announced they were planning to change the way they taxed landlords on their properties. The essence of the potential change means that landlords would not be able to claim their mortgage payments as a tax deductible expense. This has scared many amateur investors off, which is good news for the professionals. Let me explain a few things about these changes and potential implications

The people who make up the rules are the ones who make money.¹ In property. With this in mind, there are always ways around any negative changes and loopholes to be found. In this case, for example, buying properties in a Limited Company makes you exempt from the tax change. Also, another change that people are not talking about is that it is now incredibly easy to buy through a Limited Company. Coincidence? Of course not. Where one rule