

rope around their neck that is causing them sleepless nights and they wish
.they could cut it loose somehow

You come along and offer to buy it for £105,000. You will pay them in seven years' time, but in the meantime take over complete responsibility for the house and pay their mortgage. On top of that you will pay them an .additional £100 per month as a gesture of goodwill

!Will they be happy? Of course

They were going to be left penniless and they had the big job of selling the property. Instead, they will have all the hassle taken away, no estate agent
!fees, £5,000 above the asking price and £100 per month for seven years

You will also benefit greatly. You will take on a property without paying for it, you will rent the house out for £600 and make a nice profit each month, and will have the chance to buy a property in seven years' time for a price
.that's seven years old so probably an absolute bargain

You may ask, why didn't the owner just rent it out himself? There could be many answers to that question. Some people just don't want to be landlords. Maybe this man lived in the house himself and had just got divorced from his wife. He wanted to move on and sell the house but there was no equity in the house and the mortgage payments were high. There are a million different possible situations where a homeowner would benefit from being
.offered an LOA

Find your seller

When you can offer a solution to a homeowner that will seriously help them out, they will still often get cold feet when they realise how much money
.you will make from the deal

I once had an email from a distressed seller named Jeremy. He explained that he had bought a property for his son to live in, but his son had now moved out. Jeremy bought the property for £95,000 and his mortgage payments were £145 per month and his mortgage outstanding was £85,000