

worried and frustrated because his mortgage outstanding was £85,000 and it
.was looking unlikely to sell for more than £90,000

It was at this point that he emailed me asking if I would buy the property
.for a quick sale at £90,000

The magic words

I could have quickly offered Jeremy an LOA and tried to take the property off him. But I didn't because this never works; it's all about timing and the order of how you do things. I exhausted the options first with these three
:possibilities

Rent it out yourself (1

The first thing I advised Jeremy to do is to rent it out. He adamantly told me know but I tried to persuade him. I explained how he could easily get £550 rent and there was a property manager in the area that could find a tenant within two weeks. I kept pushing until Jeremy was almost red in the face with anger stating "I do not want to be a landlord." Some investors would say I was a fool to do this, because Jeremy may have listened to my advice and I could have lost a sale, but my number one priority is to add value, not
.get the deal

Persist with the agent (2

The second thing I suggested to Jeremy was that he continued trying with the estate agent. I informed him that it was normal for things to take a little .while but assured him there was nothing wrong with the property
Jeremy seemed deflated with this advice and was hoping for something more. He asked me to make him an offer and ranted to me about his
