

frustrations with the estate agent. He kept travelling for hours, just to have a
.wasted trip and a let-down viewer

Accept a BMV sale .3

Lastly, I gave Jeremy a heavily Below Market Value offer. I offered to pay £75,000. Jeremy was not having this at all and seemed a little offended. I tenderly explained that I am an investor and this is my business; I need to .make a profit. Jeremy seemed to be running out of options

On this occasion I still didn't offer Jeremy the LOA, but instead we set a date to meet again after some thinking time. I wanted him to mull over the options and I wanted him to come to a definite decision on whether he .would want to rent it out himself or not

This is genius because after this process there is no way Jeremy would get cold feet and say he wanted to just rent it out himself when he realises how .much money I will make

Also, during this process we have had time to build rapport and I have demonstrated that I truly do care about Jeremy and have taken time to come .up with many different options for him

It's when we meet for our next conversion I offer an LOA. The first thing I do is review what we have already talked about. I then ask him if he is prepared to reconsider any of the previous three options, namely, renting it out himself, persisting with the agent, or accepting a heavy BMV deal. He's still not happy with any of the options and feeling disappointed that it looks
.as though the estate agent is his only hope

Getting to this point is the hard part, the rest is pretty easy. You now have found a homeowner who would benefit from an LOA. You have exhausted his other options so he will not get cold feet after accepting the LOA. You
