

have built trust and rapport with him. Time to seal the deal. Here is exactly :what you say next

. . . Jeremy, I may be able to offer you something like this“

I pay you X (£95,000) for the property, but you wouldn't get the funds for“ another X (60) months. However, from immediate effect, I take over the mortgage payments and take over with complete responsibility for the ”.property

This way, Jeremy makes more money down the line, and gets to walk away from the headache of the house straight away. He hasn't got any equity in the property anyway, and any small amount he does have will be swallowed
.up in estate agent fees anyway

Don't answer any questions

At this point Jeremy can see that this is logically the best thing for him to ,do. However, he has loads of questions. Jeremy is thinking

What happens if you go bankrupt? What if you miss a mortgage payment?“
”?What if you die? What if I die

The worst thing to do is answer Jeremy's questions. If you answer him it will sound like you are trying to sell to him and he will raise his guard.
Also, unless you are an expert your answers will not be smooth and ,polished and this will also worry him. The thing to do is to say this Jeremy, I have explained in principle what I may be able to offer.“

However, I am sure you have got lots of questions and need to think this over. My advice would be for you to speak to a solicitor who specialises in property, and have some time to think it over. Here is the card of a solicitor I know deals with this kind of agreement (pass the card over). Perhaps you ”?could give me a call next week if you are interested

This is also absolutely genius and I have had to learn this the very hard way.
Convincing somebody who is likely to be very risk averse to agree to a
