

their advice. I am so serious about getting close to estate agents that I got a job as one for a few months

This can be a slow process but could set you up for some great deals. I usually only work with about three per city, otherwise it can become overwhelming

Deal sourcers

Deal sourcers usually spend 20 to 40 hours per week searching for good properties. These people are doing the job that you would love to do, but simply couldn't have the time

What might take an amateur 200 hours could take a professional deal sourcer a mere two hours. Building rapport with some estate agents, viewing countless properties, deciding which ones to offer on, then negotiating a good price while doing all your due diligence and working out the ROI is a lot of effort

Just being in contact with trusted, knowledgeable and professional deal sourcers is very good, but being closely networked with them is priceless

I myself often package HMOs for other investors because you cannot buy everything you see, and I pass many incredible deals. I am sometimes jealous of how good the houses are but there can be a list of reasons why the timing is not right for me to buy. Maybe my cash is tied up, or I'm out of the country and haven't got access to my required documents fast enough or I've already got a couple going though and it would upset the lenders. I just have to remember that what goes around comes around and a big part of my mission is helping others to become financially free

So the question is, how do you become well networked with deal sourcers?

It's similar to the way you network with estate agents. The best way to make friends with them is to buy from them. I would always recommend starting small though, particularly if you have not had a first-hand recommendation. Never wire £ 40,000 over to a stranger even if they promise to double it overnight. Start with one small deal, and then wait to
