

goals so tirelessly we forget to check along the way to make sure they're still the right goals for us.

Whatever your reason is for values-based spending, don't idolize the end result, fall in love with the journey. Don't put the destination on a pedestal—it doesn't belong there—and it won't earn the honor you're giving it.

If you want to make big changes, they come over time. We know you can do it. Not in the "If we can do it so can you" sort of way. But in the "You can get better at any skill you give your focus to" kind of way. You can define what you love, say no to what you don't, and don't go broke in the process.