

what completed this book. People will understand what we're trying to say now because you all said it best and you chose to say it here.

To Wendy Norman for answering our frenzied, last-minute request for author photos. You made us laugh, and you made us look good.

To Jesus, for being bigger than the idol of consumerism.

Jen's Gratitude

To Travis, for being the catalyst that started this whole journey for me. I was fine on my own, but my life has exponentially increased because of you. You are the best partner, best dad, best handyman, and worst schedule keeper I could've ever been blessed with. Thank you for your patience with me, your belief in me, and your love. There is no one else I'd ever want to do life with.

To my boys, Kairos and Atlas, when you learn to read, I hope you read this book and know that you are my highest value and purpose in life.

To my mom, thank you for being there whenever I've ever needed you. You have always been a safe space, and I don't take that for granted.

To Jill, thank you for taking this ride with me. I still don't know why you'd want to do a personal finance podcast! There's no one else I'd want to, or probably be able to, work this closely with. I'm so grateful for what we've built professionally, but I'm leaps and bounds more grateful for your friendship. I'm glad we've made it legally binding.

To Lisa Rowan, thank you for being my mentor through the years. For reading everything important I've ever written and making it ten times better. For refusing to ghostwrite this book when I asked you to. For believing in this book even before I did. Thank you for taking the time to read it at maybe one of the busiest times of your life. I would not have felt as confident about sending it in without your eyes on it.

To Caroline Vencil, thank you for your fierce support over the years. To Joe Saul-Sehy, thank you for believing in our podcast and this project. To John Stange, thank you for speaking the words I needed to hear that started this whole journey.

To the women who have shaped me in big and small ways over the last twenty years: Georginia Schutte, Katie Barnes, Alyssa Aviles, Jessica McMahan, Katie Thomas, Kayla Higginbotham, and Shelley Hancock.
