

Jill's Gratitude

To Eric, for being the best human I know. Your reckless support of my ambitions and steadfast, calm, loving presence when those ambitions feel like a dumpster fire is why I'm still standing. Thank you for being the mastermind and biggest supporter behind this whole thing. And for building our house, starting our podcast, writing our music, fixing our audio (and other) problems, and making dreams come true. You're phenomenal at everything you do, and you make life good.

To my momma, for your limitless love and support always. You consistently know what's needed, from tea with honey to pH test strips in the mail; you always take good care of me. Thank you for giving me the experiences I needed to write this book and for teaching me how to enjoy the simple pleasures of life regardless of finances.

To Gimba, for your deep love and care. For instilling the value of a good wooden spoon, introducing me to the glorious world of thrifting, and for always asking if I'm behaving. It's really the only reason this book is devoid of cursing.

To Dad, for your love and encouragement and for teaching me that everything is negotiable; it really came in handy during this book deal.

To Mom and Dad Sirianni, for your love and for cheering me on. From the food you cooked to the appliances you fixed, and all the awkward pictures you took of Jen and me writing—you made the labor of becoming an author far more manageable.

To my older sister, Jessica McCann, whose approval always mattered most. Thank you for never withholding your encouragement and belief in me. I love you dearly and am so glad I have you.

To my younger brother, Andrew Littrell, you really should read this book. And you should know how fond I am of you. I love you deeply, Bubba.

To my nieces and nephews (Dean, Lydia, Baet, Jack, Amelia, and Auggie), my heart grew with love at each of your births. Thank you for teaching me more about how to find what I value and giving me the best, most playful brain breaks in the writing process.

To Bethann Miller, for being my biggest fan and letting me be yours. Your wisdom and humor are unparalleled, and I'm a grateful recipient of both. What I've learned from you shows up a lot in these pages, and I'm forever glad to call you friend.
