

tracking your three to four actions or create new ones based on what you learned throughout the challenge.

3. Reflect

You obviously don't need to wait until after the thirty days are over to reflect on your experiences. You'll think about and reflect on the decisions you make every day of the challenge, probably right before you go to bed. But after those first two weeks, you'll have a good amount of perspective to start thinking about what you did well, what was miserable, and remind yourself what all of this is really for. If you bought something you hadn't planned on, then come up with ideas and a plan that allows you to make a different decision next time.

Steve Jobs once said,⁷ "People think focus means saying 'yes' to the thing you've got to focus on. But that's not what it means at all. It means saying 'no' to the hundred other good ideas that there are. You have to pick carefully."

A no-spend challenge allows you the space (and excuse!) to say no to the hundreds of good ideas around you so you can train your brain to say yes to the things that matter.

When we reset our dopamine receptors, we can better identify the boundary lines of our capacities and resources, both internal and external.

Lightning Round

What are the manufactured desires that you're spending on in your life?

Action Step

Pick a day to start your thirty-day no-spend challenge and start preparing for it.
