

hotter war zones like Times Square or the Jerome Avenue line.

Before going to Spain you should read Michener's Iberia and Hemingway's Death in the Afternoon. Michener's lengthy work tells why he loves Spain and gives details of his lengthy travels there. Read it as background before you go and as a tourist guide while you're there.

Death in the Afternoon, now over fifty years old, is Hemingway's classic, nonfiction work on bullfights. Vicki and I went to bullfights most Sunday afternoons and many Friday nights. When we couldn't get to the bullring, we watched bullfights on TV. I bought bullfight magazines and spent days in the library reading up on the subject.

Bullfighting is a spectacle, not a sport or a fair fight: the bull always dies. Bullfighting owes its popularity to the Spanish fear of death. One way to confront that fear and try to overcome it is through bullfights. The bulls are wild and fierce, stronger and more savage than tigers or elephants, and seemingly without fear of death. The torero can come as close to death as he wants by moving closer to the bull's horns.

Madrid hosts the most serious bullfights during its festivals in May and October. If you're interested, make sure you plan your trip around those events. Tickets, especially for the good seats, are expensive and hard to get. Try to have a friend in Madrid pick them up for you in advance. If you don't know anyone in Madrid, arrive a few days early and buy them at the bullring.

YUGOSLAVIA

The Adriatic coast of Yugoslavia offers sparkling clear water, five-hundred-year-old stucco hotels, a wonderful blend of Latin and Slavic cultures, and people as friendly as anywhere in the world.

Yugoslav tourist pamphlets note that "since the break with