

Stalin and the Eastern bloc in 1948, the country has followed a foreign policy of nonalignment and has developed its own brand of socialism based on worker management of industry, commerce, and public services, which are socially owned. However, most agricultural land (85 percent) belongs to individual farmers and there are numerous privately owned small businesses."

In terms of vigilance and control, Yugoslavia is as different from its communist neighbors as the University of Miami is from West Point. Yugoslavs can go to Italy, Austria, Hungary, or anyplace else, as they wish, for as long as they want. Yugoslavia has mutually abolished visas with most European countries. U.S. citizens can get a free one-year visa that permits multiple entry.

Consider renting a house or apartment in Yugoslavia year-round. Use it as an inexpensive base of operations to explore southern Europe. Yugoslavia has beaches on the Adriatic and world-class ski resorts in the mountains. You can go hiking or backpacking, water ski, relax in health spas, hunt, or fish. If you get bored, head to neighboring Austria, Italy, Greece, Bulgaria, Romania, Russia, or Hungary. You're only a few hours by train from any of them.

Spend plenty of time in Yugoslavia's tranquil cafés. Many are on sidewalks, where you can tap your feet to the rhythm of engines backfiring. Others are tucked away in white stucco rooms that were once the ground floor of Venetian-era bourgeois homes. Still others are in shady gardens, central plazas, or along the rivers. Waiters never rush; once you've finished your coffee you can stay forever. Cafés are an ideal place to observe the world around you, ponder philosophical questions, and catch up on reading.
