

United States may be good or not so good. But one thing's for sure: the cost will be exorbitant. Medical care in the Third World may be good or not so good. But one thing's for sure: the cost will be reasonable.

Remember that you're retiring overseas at age 35, not 65. You're less likely than an older person to require specialized medical care. If you do, you may be able to get it where you live. If not, you may have to return for expensive treatment in the United States. If that happens you could be ruined. But at your age, if you live abroad, it's probably a risk you can afford to take. When you're older you may want to buy health insurance in the United States, say with a $2,000 deductible, to cover the "worst case" contingency.

LEGAL PROBLEMS ABROAD

Stephen H. Collins wrote an article on the U.S. tort system in the November 1985 Journal of Accountancy. It began with this:

Pick up a newspaper and one of the first stories to hit you involves a lawsuit. The weather bureau is sued because it fails to predict a storm, a lawn mower manufacturer is sued because its product is too hard to start, Little League baseball officials are sued because a player is hit by a fly ball, students sue teachers for failing to teach them adequately, children sue parents for improper upbringing, a restaurant critic is sued because of an unfavorable review, ad infinitum.

Last year, there was one private civil lawsuit filed for every 15 Americans. An estimated 16.6 million private civil suits were tried in Federal courts, nearly double the amount a decade ago.

One of the pleasures of moving overseas is leaving the U.S. tort system behind. Foreigners tend to work through
