

financial unknowns. You should also postpone getting a vasectomy, training for a marathon, getting married, chairing your town's United Crusade, or starting a course in the Zen of junk bonds. You should even postpone tackling the items on your to-do list. Instead, fill your days with the things you used to do after work and on weekends. Read, swim, play golf, watch TV, sleep late, go for a drive, and have barbecue parties. Take it easy on yourself for the first time in two decades. The rule is:

Fill your new days with old activities

When you follow this rule, don't worry about getting your new life under way. Dawdle. You're not lazy, you're just managing change. Dawdle for three or four or six months if you like. Fall into your new life with an easy, relaxed roll. You've got thirty or more years of active retired life ahead of you. That's plenty of time to accomplish what you have in mind. Take the first few months to relax a little. You deserve it.
