Johnny will go to class with the children of wealthy Brazilians, diplomats, and expatriates. He'll learn a foreign language or two, play soccer instead of baseball, and eat feijoada instead of hot dogs.

International schools overseas make sense while your kids are small. Once Johnny's in high school, however, you'll probably want to move back to the United States. That's because Johnny will most likely be going to a public college or university. To get free or low-cost resident tuition, you have to have your principal residence in the state where Johnny goes to college. It's hard to demonstrate residency in, say, North Carolina when you live in Brazil.

Some states offer resident tuition to anyone who lives in the state, even if they've been there only a short time. Others offer resident tuition only after a certain number of years of residency. And states differ in how they determine who's a resident. In general, if you look like a resident, act like a resident, and pay taxes like a resident, you're a resident. To make dead sure Johnny meets a given state's requirements for free or low-cost resident tuition, get a copy of the catalog and application for the public university of choice. You'll find copies in state libraries and the counselor's office at the local high school. Better yet, write the university and ask them to send you a copy. The catalog will define a resident and tell how many years of residency you need before Johnny qualifies.
