

see. Invariably she begins to feel better and enjoy the task more.

In spite of your best efforts, though, you may be unable or unwilling to stretch in your current situation. Or you may be stretching like a rubber band and still not getting anywhere. Perhaps the time has come to change careers.

The Globe article by Sarah Snyder concludes that "the number of professionals who from frustration, boredom, or simple lust for more money abandon their careers for new ones in their early 30's are increasing." Richard Grossman, author of Choosing and Changing (Dutton, 1978), says "it's a legacy of the 60's. It is as legitimate to question career commitments as everything else."

The Globe article tells of a nurse who became an investment banker, a college professor who became a vice president of Kidder, Peabody, and a newspaper reporter who became a lawyer. These people were motivated to change careers when they asked themselves, "What am I going to be doing ten years from now?" In every case they decided their old jobs offered little hope for the future. In every case they enjoy their new career at least as much as the old. And in every case they're making more money—generally a lot more money—in their new jobs.

My friend Suzanne is a research psychologist. Her field is personality testing. Ten years ago she became a full professor at the University of Southern California. A few years after that she wrote a college textbook, then a book on research technique. She became chairman of the psychology department. But two years ago she decided she was tired of applying for grants, writing textbooks, and teaching sophomores. She was reluctant to give up what she had worked so hard to achieve. But when she got an offer to work for an executive search firm as a consultant, she took the job.

Suzanne now studies potential top executives, and she loves it. She never has to apply for grants; if she wants to do a project, the money's there. The money's there for Suzanne,
