

suits. They write screenplays, learn to sail, follow a baseball team around the country, make speeches, or study the law. And whatever they do, they do it with a spirit of adventure and sense of humor.

In the end, although this book is about retiring young, it's more about retiring well. Whether you're 35, 55, or 75 when you retire, the idea is to enjoy yourself. To contribute and learn rather than feel you're killing time. To grow and develop rather than sit in front of a TV. To love and cherish rather than become bitter and sad. To recognize that retirement can be life's exciting dessert—whatever your age when you start it.
