Motivation and Goals

Don Bosson, a top division manager based in Joliet, Illinois and number one in the Fuller Brush company, is the quintessential committed salesman with strong values and valuable ideas about how to succeed in sales. He's been with the Fuller Brush company for nearly thirty years after a brief career as a luncheonette manager for W. T. Grant. He found his way to sales serendipitously.

"A friend told me he was selling for Fuller Brush and that it was a great thing to do. I thought I'd take a look at the business," he explained. "Since it was okay with the company for me to go out in the field with my friend. I did, and that clinched it. He was so bad—he did everything badly—that I thought, if this guy can make money selling door-to-door, so can I. As it turned out, I joined the company and he quit two months later."

Don excelled at sales and was promoted to field manager after two years, where he mostly recruited dealers. "At that time, twenty-four years ago, we just looked for men who wanted full-time sales jobs. It was company policy. Now that's all changed. We have mostly part-timers, and both men and women."

Over the years, he moved up to the top slot with Fuller Brush. What does he have that's special? How did he do
