

lot of money, after retiring. But if you follow this book's formula, most of you will never work another day in your life unless you choose to do so.

Still, financial disaster could strike. When that happens you'll probably have a good sum in CDs, enough money to carry you a few more years. But you'll recognize that because of low real rates, unusually high expenses, or whatever, you'll have to get a job.

First, you'll want to remember to take your time looking for work. It took you time to decide to retire. Give yourself a decent amount of time—six months or a year—to reload the work habit. You'll have lived without a paycheck for years. You should be able to last another six months or so.

Second, recognize that the $50-a-Day Rule will have become a way of life. Even if you go back to work, you'll spend less than you did during your earlier, fast-track career days. So you can accept a lower salary than before and still have plenty of money to live well.

When you look for a job, don't consider that you're still a lawyer, engineer, personnel manager, surgeon, editor, marketing rep, or whatever you were before you retired. You'll be in your 40s or 50s. It's hard enough for "old-timers" to get a job. And you'll have been out of the labor force for years. Your knowledge will be out-of-date. Headhunters will talk to you the way undertakers talk to the bereaved. Headhunters try to steal stars from name companies rather than take chances on "has-beens" who were foolish enough to take time off.

So, instead of trying to pick up where you left off, repack-age yourself. Create a second career, taking advantage of what you learned and the people you met during retirement. Start with a list of what you did in retirement. Then decide how to take advantage of that in starting a second career.

A man retires and, among other things, gets involved with community affairs. He sets up a coordinating group for block associations, raises funds for a new civic auditorium, and
