

pushes for an urban bicycle freeway. When he goes back to work, he looks for a job in state or local government. He begins his job search by calling those officials who helped him with his projects.

A woman retires and, for fun, writes a weekly column on child rearing for the local newspaper. When she goes back to work, she converts her column to a daily and tries to syndicate.

A couple retires and moves to Brazil. When they go back to work, they try to get a license to represent American products in Rio de Janeiro or São Paulo.

The best book I've seen on how to repackage yourself is Richard Bolles's What Color Is Your Parachute? (Ten Speed Press, 1987). Now in its umpteenth edition, the book helps you focus on what you want to do rather than on "just getting a job." What Color Is Your Parachute? tells how to contact others to help decide where you might fit in. Once you know what you want to do, why you want to do it, and what you have to offer, you interview better and impress people more. You'll get the job not because of your resume but because of your enthusiasm, insight, and sense of direction.

If and when you go back to work, you'll have grown spiritually and intellectually. You'll have enjoyed your kids while they were young, pushed a lot of stress out of your life, and seen the world. You'll have gained insight that can help you enjoy life more. You may wish you could stay retired. But you'll be excited about the possibilities of a second career.
