

life who Choose FI, this can be a huge accomplishment. Consider that “normal” for most people means having debt, whether from credit cards, car loans, student loans, and/or other consumer debt. On top of that, the largest expense for most people is housing, with rent or mortgage payments due each month.

For many, the next paycheck will be spent paying for past decisions. This is a restrictive way to live. You go to work to collect a paycheck just to prevent someone from coming to repossess what you already have. There is no freedom to choose the life you want going forward.

Having no net worth is not a “worthless” goal. Whether you choose to define this as being debt free, debt free excluding a mortgage or having a net worth of zero (assets minus liabilities), hitting this milestone is important because it gives you options going forward.

Jonathan

I lost over a decade accumulating and then paying off debt for a degree that I’m no longer using. I didn’t appreciate the time value of money. I graduated at the age of twenty-eight with $168,000 in debt.