

money ever. Women are the biggest market out there for age-defying “solutions.” Did you know that the only companies that don’t suffer much during hard economic times are those in the beauty industry? People losing everything want to look good. That’s why I like to invest in cosmetics companies.

But in the interest of saving you money, I’m going to state a few things unequivocally: Botox and fillers probably won’t make you look younger, just different, and in many cases, they actually make you look worse—that’s karma in action. And that’s also just my opinion.

The point is, beyond the aesthetics of these procedures, once you go down the Botox and filler route, you’ve become just another revenue stream for a multibillion-dollar cosmetics industry. These companies will do everything in their power to make you continually chase results that will remain elusive. And in many cases, you have to keep injecting hundreds of dollars of chemicals into your face every few months until you die, which is why I say investing trumps injecting. They’re lifetime financial commitments, results not guaranteed. Botox costs on average about $400 per treatment, and it’s recommended you get injected three times a year, at a cost of $1,200. And if you start in your forties and stop in your sixties, say, you’re blowing up to $24,000 on procedures that haven’t actually added much value to your life.

So save a dime and stop buying beauty magazines. They’re brainwashing you into thinking that beauty is only about youth and thinness. According to online consumer guides and many honest experts, the cream you buy at the local pharmacy is often as effective as the high-end product. In other words, repair your finances, not your face. You’re going to get old anyway, so why waste money avoiding the inevitable? In my TV work, I have yet to see a face filled with chemicals that looks great. Instead, be graceful about getting old, because when it comes to feeling youthful, vital, and energized, no amount of Botox beats money in the bank.
