

EPILOGUE

Getting to “Enough”

I believe money makes life easier. But you might be surprised to learn that I don't think money necessarily makes life better. We probably all know miserable rich people. I certainly do. You couldn't pay me to live their lives. But the truly wealthy people I know, the ones with more than just money to account for their joy, seem to have one simple secret. You hear it over and over again. It is this: Even when I hardly had anything, I always had enough. When you get to a place of “enough,” you will stop having money problems. Some people find that path spiritually, some through their families or community involvement, some through plain hard work and dedication. Some, like the folks in Debtors Anonymous, come to this place through awful financial strife. How you get to that place of “enough” is your own business. But you have to get there, or else, no matter how much money you have, it's never going to feel sufficient.

I've discovered that money is the most forgiving energy on the planet. The second you begin to make even the most minor positive adjustments to your spending, saving, or investment habits, money begins to flow back to you. And I believe you have a choice about how you spend your money. What you spend money on is the manifestation of that choice. As you've read in these pages, better choices mean more money. It is that simple. If you look at every financial transaction of your life as representative of the kind of person you are or want to be, a shift will happen.

Until you behave differently with money, nothing will change. Simply put, until you actually stop overspending, until you actually