

Making money while shoveling snow for the neighbors in 1972.
(Georgette Kanawaty)

That January marked the first moment I understood that my time was worth money. This is a potent awareness in a young person. It's something that, as a parent, you can instill in your children from an early age. It's something that my wife, in particular, was very good at teaching our children from the moment they could walk and talk. Linda and I had no money when we got married. She had huge student loans that she paid off with her bonuses from a sales job. She worked like a dog to do that. Luckily, I married a woman for whom material things have never been that important, and she has passed that attitude on to our children. Admittedly, she was stricter with the kids regarding money, especially as they became teenagers. They weren't given an allowance. They had jobs as soon as they were old enough to work part-time—my daughter, Savannah, at a bakery when she was fourteen, and my son, Trevor, babysitting when he was eleven. (Today, at fifteen, he makes a tidy side income refurbishing not-so-old technology and selling it on the Internet.) Working part-time is how
