

2. Hit the road, but not too far. Everybody loves a good road trip. To save on gas, consider choosing a nearby destination, and be sure to check GasBuddy.com to find the cheapest price. To save on lodging, see if anyone you know will be going on their own vacation and might volunteer to let you stay in their house while they're gone. "Subletting" has all the appeal of a hotel—you're someplace new and exotic—with more of the little luxuries you're used to (a working coffee maker, couches you can actually sit on). Early on in our relationship, Linda and I flew to California, rented a car and drove through Napa Valley on a wine tour. One of my venture capitalist friends had a gorgeous place in Sonoma and let us have it for the week. Linda and I still talk fondly about that trip. Bonus: more time in the car means more time to talk about the future.

3. Revamp a business trip. If your company sends you somewhere interesting, that's half the fare paid for. You can't expect work to pick up the tab for your partner's meals, but consider tacking on some vacation time before or after your trip and having your spouse meet you once your business duties are over. To this day, Linda often accompanies me on business trips; she'll come with me to Los Angeles when I'm filming Shark Tank. During the day, she gets to do her own thing, and at night we enjoy all that the city has to offer. Bonus: when you're on a business trip, many of the "extras" are tax-deductible for you (not for your spouse), so be sure to keep all your receipts and talk to your accountant about itemizing deductions.

4. Have a staycation. A "staycation" is just a vacation where you stay at home. Simply use your place as a home base for local adventures—go pick blackberries, check out a museum exhibit you've been wanting to see, or attend a nearby music
