

work with me at O'Leary Funds and O'Leary Mortgages much more than once a year. Guess what? He loved it. He toured the office, talked to employees and saw how the businesses worked, and it raised a lot of questions for him.

O'Leary Funds is an exciting place, especially to an eight-year-old. There are two rows of machines flickering global data nonstop. We have TVs set to all the big stations around the world: BBC, CNBC, CBC. Trevor's eyes widened as he took it all in.

"What are all those screens?" he asked.

"We're watching every market in the world," I explained. "We're buying and selling stocks in countries around the world."

Trevor looked impressed.

"See that man over there?" I said. "He's one of our dedicated employees. He's been here since 4 A.M."

"Does he work all night?"

"Sometimes. Have you ever heard of Tokyo Risk?"

Trevor shook his head.

"Investors don't like to go to bed in New York with any strings left untied, because if something happens in Tokyo while they're sleeping, everything could change. So that's why this guy works strange hours—to keep a close eye on our funds."

I walked Trevor down the hall to O'Leary Mortgages. Rick, one of our top employees, had just gotten off the phone with a woman who wanted an insured mortgage. Rick gave us her story in a nutshell: "She wants a $350,000 mortgage to buy a condominium."

Trevor's jaw dropped. "But that's so much money!"

"Yes, it is," Rick said, and then explained the woman's situation. She was 26 years old and had been at her job for a year and a half after a series of temporary positions. She was looking at a mortgage that would have her paying at least $1,800 a month, and she was only bringing in $2,600 of income. Even my eight-year-old son could see the problem.

"Don't give her the money, Dad!"

I assured Trevor that we work closely with our clients to ensure they don't bite off more than they can chew. That day made a big
