

At the 1988 Comdex Conference in Las Vegas. This is one of the earliest pictures I have from my SoftKey Software Products start-up days. The dot matrix printers seen here are most likely on display at the Smithsonian! SoftKey went on to become The Learning Company, which was eventually sold to Mattel for $4.2 billion.

This is going to come in handy, because the day she turns nine you're going to sit down for a little chat. If she has saved every penny you've given her over the last five years, she should have a full $450 in her Meanie Money Bin. If she's done this, she deserves a pat on the back. That's a lot of money! If she hasn't—if she's spent some of her Meanie Money along the way—that's okay, too. But here's where she benefits from her own good money management: that $450 is going straight toward the special prize or reward you agreed on four years ago. Time to hit up that theme park or go to the fancy hotel she loves. And she's going to fund the family adventure!

If she's depleted her Meanie Money over the last four years, she may ask if there's a way to earn some of it back. It's up to you to decide how. As I said in my last book, I don't believe in a traditional
