

1. The baker by boat. When Savannah was 14, she got a job at the bakery in Muskoka. She loved baking, so it was a great way to do something she enjoyed and actually get paid for it. Every morning she got up at 5:30 A.M., when the rest of us were still asleep, and took herself to the bakery. She couldn't drive yet, so she used our old Boston Whaler and went down the lake by boat! Savannah worked at that bakery for four summers, never missing a single morning. While other teenagers were out partying until 2 and 3 A.M., Savannah was in bed by a reasonable hour. Talk about making sacrifices!
2. The camp counselor extraordinaire. When he was 11, Trevor started babysitting for a friend of ours with young kids. He was a natural, and before long he was getting requests from other parents to babysit their kids, too. To meet demand, Trevor designed a summer program for half a dozen six-year-olds. Their parents would drop them off each morning and he would entertain them all day. He planned all sorts of activities, including soccer, gymnastics, Lego-building contests, arts and crafts, and full-fledged scavenger hunts. Trevor put a lot into this, and the kids had a blast.
3. The garage sale profiteer. A few summers back, one of Trevor's friends, Emma, got really bored and decided to have a garage sale. But instead of just selling her own stuff, she devised a plan to expand her profit margins. Emma went door to door and asked all of her neighbors if they had anything they'd like to sell. All they had to do was leave their goods on their front porch the morning of the sale and Emma would collect, price and sell it. "You keep 90 percent," Emma explained. "I'll take a 10 percent commission." The neighbors were thrilled—they didn't have to raise a finger and were getting most of the profits. Emma ended up collecting goods
