

CHAPTER 8

KIDS: GET A JOB!

About a year ago, I discovered my son had an extraordinary talent. I'd just gotten home from a Shark Tank shoot in Los Angeles after a long, grueling week. I was relaxing with my wife downstairs, about to enjoy a nice glass of O'Leary wine, when the whole house started to shake. The bass-pounding was so brutal I thought the ceiling was about to come down on our heads.

"What is that noise?" I asked.

Linda smiled. "Trevor!" she shouted.

We both knew our 15-year-old son liked listening to his electronic music, but by the time I got to the upstairs landing, the boom taka taka boom taka taka was deafening. When I pounded on Trevor's bedroom door, I could feel vibrations in my skull.

"Come in!" he yelled, and I stepped inside.

I was about to tell him to turn his horrible music off when I noticed Trevor wasn't at his stereo. He was sitting in front of two computer screens, both filled with lines of complex coding. He was bent over the keyboard, furiously typing away, as new codes appeared onscreen.

"What on earth are you doing?"

"Composing!"