

“Dad, you’ve got like a billion followers on Twitter.”

“Let me hear the track.” I listened, and again, my son blew me away. The track was enthralling and intense, musically advanced and inventive.

© Matt Barnes.

Music has always been a huge part of my life. I’ve always loved playing the guitar (like the Gibson Les Paul seen here). This passion for music is something I’ve passed on to my children, especially my son, Trevor. You have to find time in your life for your passions. With instruments as beautiful as these, who wouldn’t want to jam every now and then?

“This is amazing, Trevor,” I said. “I’ll do it. I’ll tweet it.” And I did. And that’s when things went nuts. Suddenly, Trevor was getting all kinds of web traffic thanks to the tweet. A major producer from Atlanta contacted him by email and said, “I heard ‘Orangutan.’ Can you send me a mash of your tracks?” (A mash, I’ve since learned, is when you put your tracks in order, as if you were doing a club date.)