

business someday, this is the perfect way to get them started. Go to the website for more info: www.ontario.ca/business-and-economy/start-summer-business-students

3. Product merchandiser. You know those smiling young people handing out samples at the grocery store? Those are product merchandisers. They also restock the shelves and take inventory. It's a good, safe job with the perk of being indoors during the steamy summer months. And it usually pays slightly over minimum wage, averaging around $12.50 an hour.
4. Camp counselor/lifeguard. What's summer without summer camp? If your teen goes to work every day in a fun, vibrant environment, he or she will be much more excited to get out of bed in the morning. The pay isn't usually great, but the community of people can make up for it. And we all know that being a lifeguard carries plenty of cultural cachet (not to mention a nice tan by the end of the summer). The Canadian Red Cross Lifeguard program allows kids to be certified at age 15. Talk about a great way to teach your teenagers about responsibility: they'll actually be safeguarding people's lives.
5. Junior park ranger. Parks Canada (www.pc.gc.ca) offers over 1,000 student jobs across the nation. They typically run from May to September and give students opportunities to work in resource conservation, visitor services, heritage preservation and waterways. Your teenager will get valuable experience and a great boost to the résumé. Linda spent one summer on the Trent-Severn Waterway, Lock 44. She greeted the boats as they came in, took their lines, tied them up and sold them a pass to go through the locks for the day. She got to spend all day on the water, talking to boaters, and she absolutely loved it. The first summer she applied, she didn't