

of companies and wear many different hats, sussing out what you like and what you don't.

I worked as a bartender throughout college to help offset my living expenses. I got pretty good at soliciting tips. I also saw the dark side of drinking. There were many nights when I would have to break up fights, help a waitress fend off a drunkard's advances or call an ambulance for a patron who had passed out. I give up drinking for three weeks each January just to prove to myself that I can do it—the weight loss is an added bonus. In this picture I'm embracing my server roots, at a Paris nightclub while out on the town with The Learning Company's European customers.
