

that pair well with anything. Guys can get away with five pairs of shoes. My wife and daughter would kill me if I enforced the same standard on them, so to all the young women out there: seven pairs of shoes. That's all you get. That's me being generous.

Another common money trap is the home makeover. Do not—I repeat, do not—give in to the siren song of Ikea. The individual items are cheap enough, but by the time you've wound your way through the whole maze of a store, you're apt to have collected $500 worth of disposable furniture. There's no shame in buying things secondhand and accepting hand-me-downs. I have an even better idea: take all that furniture you had in your room at home with you so your parents can have the space back (and breathe a sigh of relief that you're not planning on moving back in as an adult).

Money Mistake: You Overshare on Social Media

The Fix: Protect Your Financial Interests

A 2012 survey revealed that the average Canadian spends almost an hour and a half a day on social networking sites—Facebook, YouTube, Google+, Pinterest, LinkedIn, Reddit and Twitter, to name a few. But do you know the hidden costs that can come with social media? I'm not just talking about lost productivity (a recent study in the U.K. showed that Twitter and other social networking sites are costing firms approximately £1.38 billion every year). I'm talking about the jobs you're going to lose from prospective employers who don't like what they see on your profile.

CareerBuilder recently conducted an online survey of more than 2,100 hiring managers and resource professionals. They found that 39 percent of companies use social networking sites to get information on job candidates. They didn't always like what they found. When employers stopped considering a candidate for a position because of what they found on social media, these were the most common reasons:
