If you've got anything online that fits into one of these six categories, you are playing with fire. Racy comments, office gossip, topless photos, pics of you holding a bong—not only are these inappropriate, they're moronic. I've just given you solid proof that employers do trawl social networking sites to see what you're like when you're not in your best suit, sitting across the interview table and answering every question with a smile. All it takes is one picture to ruin your future. That one little tag could mean the difference between growing your financial dynasty and remaining unemployed.

Check your privacy settings. Sites like Facebook are constantly changing their platform; even if you think your privacy settings are sewn up tight, they might not be. Keep a close eye on what your friends post. They may think they're being funny, but if they put up photos of you in a compromising position, they are messing with your future. You can ask them to be more circumspect, but ultimately it is your responsibility to monitor your social media
