

diligence' process included! Slowly, I learned what the job entailed and what the boundaries of my purview were. It turned out the real job was 'make Kevin money' and the boundaries were virtually limitless. Being given that kind of responsibility was scary at first, but exciting and motivating, too." Not only did Ramin become a pro at doing due diligence, he was able to put his other skills to excellent use. Turns out he's a Photoshop pro, and when I had a photo exhibit coming up, he became my technician—and he did an amazing job.

5. Pay your own way. To supplement her internship, Rebecca took on freelance design work that she completed in the evenings and on weekends. "I had a part-time job throughout university. I know what it takes to live on a student budget," she says. James supported himself through a combination of savings and loans. "I saved enough to make it through the first year of my MBA and the summer internship," he says. Ramin had saved money from previous jobs and ran a profitable business to boot. He also has an enormous line of student credit. I told him he had better be careful not to rack up enormous debt!
6. Network, network, network. All our interns benefit from getting to network with some of the biggest and best in a variety of industries. "I've exchanged business cards with people I never would have come into contact with otherwise," Rebecca says. Ramin now personally knows all 10 celebrity investors on Shark Tank and Dragons' Den, as well as their teams. "My friends have already begun pitching me new business opportunities!" I took all three interns with me to Los Angeles last week, where they got to visit the Shark Tank set and hobnob. "It's been a fascinating experience," James says. "One I'll never forget."
