

It is said that “Old friends are gold.” As time passes, I realize how true this is. I made these friends during a period when my balance sheet was upside down and I was technically bankrupt. We all worked at The Learning Company together and the battle to succeed formed relationships that are still strong to this day. Sometimes we celebrate by going away for a weekend. The pursuit of wealth is not about money; it’s about freedom. And there is no more noble a cause than that.

Just as Rob’s family dynasty includes his comrades in arms, your “family” could include your colleagues and close friends. What’s important is that these are people you can trust and depend on and who bring essential skills to the team. Think of the business world like a war zone, then hire the men and women you are ready to fight alongside every day.

Money Mistake: Your Product or Service Isn’t You

The Fix: Monetize Your Unique Skills and Experience

Rob Dyer is a great example of an entrepreneur who figured out what he was good at and found a way to monetize it. When it came time to develop the product itself, Rob and the other special-ops
