

spending close to $4,000 a month. Suddenly, your social life costs more than your apartment! Something's got to give.

Then there's the money you spend on clothes. Obviously, you don't want to go on a date wearing pajama bottoms. There's no reason to be slovenly; you want to make a good presentation. But that doesn't mean you need to overinflate your wardrobe with pricey pieces. The key is to carefully select a handful of timeless classics and then mix and match. In my last book, I mentioned the stylish Chanel jacket my mother wore for 20 years. My daughter, Savannah, has put a new twist on the family tradition: she recently bought a great dress for $10. It was too big for her, so she had it altered for $20. She now has a $30 dress that people think is worth $1,000. Talk about the new Georgette! Those are the kind of family values I want to pass from generation to generation.

I love cooking. One of my favorite dishes is escargots served in the shell. When I was single, my best strategy was to bring my date over to my place for a romantic dinner where I would start with my escargots and end with my crêpes flambées. It was far less expensive than going to a high-end restaurant, and showing off my culinary skills gave me a competitive advantage. It significantly improved my batting average! My future wife, Linda, took this picture on our second date in 1982.
