

beneficiaries decide whether to keep, sell or rent the property in question.

- 3. Have you made funeral arrangements? You can plan out every detail of your funeral, right down to the musical accompaniment and how many cocktail onions will be served in the drinks.

I've made my pitch for cremation, but there's no shame in a traditional burial. When I graduated from university, one of the girls in my class took a sales job at a well-known cemetery. She needed sales badly, so I started buying plots from her. Over the years, I amassed eight plots and eventually consolidated them into one location. My mother is buried there, and there's space for my entire family when we pass on. Today, those plots have gone up in value so much that they are one of the best investments I've ever made!

- 4. Have you written down all of your email and social media passwords? I can't stress how important this is. Write down the login ID, password and PIN number for every single site you use (and your computer itself). Bank websites, sites for auto and property insurance, Facebook, Twitter, and any and all email accounts. You probably have login information stored at more websites than you think, so be thorough. If you don't do this, your partner or grown child could spend many hours on the phone, trying to cut through the bureaucratic red tape. Time is money: don't waste theirs.
