

Me with my father, Terence O'Leary, in 1958. Although he died just a few years later, I still have memories of him. He was a classic Irishman: very gregarious with many friends. He was a fantastic salesman, something I'm proud to say I inherited. I was not surprised when Peter Munk, the founder of Barrick Gold, called me one day out of the blue to tell me that he had traveled with my father from Ireland to North America in the late '40s. He had only good things to say about my dad.

I'm not saying you and your partner can't drink. One of my businesses is O'Leary Fine Wines, which Linda and I co-own. We both love a nice glass of wine, and creating our own label has given us a lot of joy. But I've always known alcoholism was in my genes, so I have been very careful about drinking in moderation, modeling the same thing to my kids. Linda and I have tried to foster a healthy relationship with alcohol. I want my children to understand that leaning too hard on alcohol will bleed them dry, drop by drop, penny by penny.

I'm less lenient on drug use. You never know who's going to become the addict; it could be you or it could be somebody else. Bottom line: drugs destabilize the family dynasty. They have a
