

financial literacy. These are the five ways people spend, save and steal money—and the attendant costs you're likely to incur depending on the fluency of who you marry.

1. The Mooch

The mooch is someone who won't pay for anything. You know the type—he's the one who suggests you go out to eat with a bunch of friends, then claims he forgot his wallet and asks if you can spot him (and never pays you back). Or she ducks out of paying her fair share when it's time to split the bill, claiming the service was poor so she's not adding a tip—and, oh look, it seems she's never heard of tax being added to a bill.

Some mooches come from backgrounds where there was never enough. Never enough money, never enough resources, never enough time. They're stuck in a Depression-era mentality, governed by the economics of scarcity, and if you let them, they will suck you down into the same black hole.

At some point, the mooch will try to borrow money from you, maybe even on the first date. Don't think you're special. The mooch is no stranger to loans from friends and family. Your due diligence may in fact reveal that she has been disenfranchised from her family because she constantly borrowed money from her parents or siblings until the family had no choice but to cut her off. If you marry this person, you, too, will get ostracized from his or her family. That's something you should know up front. Don't say I didn't warn you.

2. The Spendaholic

The spendaholic is someone who tries to buy friendship. We all know who these people are: they're the ones always offering to pay for everybody, trying desperately to appear popular and successful. Don't be fooled. This is a disease masquerading as generosity. Spendaholics are the people who, if they don't get their spending in check, end up in Debtors Anonymous. They almost always have personal debt, which they often hide or minimize, and most of the
