

If you marry a loafer, be prepared to pay all the bills and do all the work for two (or more if you have kids)—for the rest of your married life. If you have financial goals, you're going to be on your own in attaining them. If you try to have a candid discussion about money, he or she will accuse you of being too uptight or not understanding his or her barriers. And when he brings home that new flat-screen TV? You're the one who'll be paying for it.

Taking a “disco nap” after a late night out in New Orleans with friends. By March 1999, The Learning Company was the largest educational software company in the world. Our sales were closing in on the billion-dollar mark that year and there were several companies interested in buying us. I was constantly on the road with investors and bankers. It was during this period that I developed the ability to take twenty-minute naps anywhere and anytime. No matter how crazy my schedule gets, I still use my power naps to keep going.
