

with your sleeping bag in the car, too hungry and annoyed to sleep.

- d) Suddenly has a large chunk of change and presents you with a plane ticket to Switzerland ... for tonight. When you tell him you need more time, he panics. He seems strangely anxious to get out of the country.
- e) Opens a dialogue about cool vacation ideas. Together you come up with the perfect plan: you'll drive a little ways out of the city, where your mutual friends have given you free use of their cottage while they're away for the weekend. You spend two glorious days lazily soaking up sun and getting to know each other better. The best part: you cook all of your meals, which not only gives you bonding time in the kitchen, it means your romantic getaway costs nothing more than a tank of gas and some groceries.

If you primarily answered a), you may be dating a mooch. Your partner treats you like a bank—except that, unlike a bank, money will only trickle out and never in. Time to play hardball and redefine the boundaries of your relationship. Even a bank can renegotiate terms.

If you primarily answered b), you may be dating a spendaholic. Tying your fate to this person is on par with a slow march to debtors' prison. Do not move forward unless you see serious improvement with regard to your partner's spending habits, and unless you are 100 percent sure he or she is paying down debt.

If you primarily answered c), you may be dating a loafer. Your partner is still suckling financially from the parental teat. If he or she won't grow up, find someone who will. You deserve better than an overgrown toddler.

If you primarily answered d), you may be dating a thief. Unfortunately, a good thief is notoriously good at defrauding
