

Linda and I in August 2006 at a friend's wedding in Nassau, Bahamas. I was coming out of a three-year retirement and just starting to dabble in a new hobby: television. Life is full of serendipity. You never know what will be just around the corner.

Not only is it possible, it's true. I'm going to let you in on a little secret: the main reason a marriage breaks up is not infidelity; with hard work, forgiveness and reprioritizing, that can be survived. The real threat to marriage is poor money management or a lack of funds. Not having enough of it, not agreeing on how to manage it, spending too much, saving too little—it's almost always about money. You want a marriage that will last? Then you had better make sure your partner speaks the same money language. You had better make sure you have money at the beginning of your marriage, and—this part is non-negotiable—that you have a good deal more of it by the end. One divorce can destroy everything you've built, costing you hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions. It is absolutely essential that your partnership run smoothly right out of the gate.
