

and sticking to a budget are the mortar that will make a solid, good life possible.

Though I advocate having separate accounts and separate investment advisors, you want to grow your financial dynasty together. In order for that to happen, you and your partner must have a clear idea of your current financial situation. In my last book, I showed you how to determine your 90-Day Number. This is the number you get when you add up every source of income you receive over a three-month period, and then subtract every expense you've got. This calculation is too important a step to skip, so I'm going to walk you through the process here. Below, I've included the 90-Day Number worksheet from Men, Women & Money. This time, I want you to complete the exercise with your partner.

Money Mistake: You Don't Know How Much Money You Have

The Fix: Calculate Your 90-Day Number

First, gather your pay stubs and your partner's. If you can't track them all down, pull up your bank statements from the last three months. Write down every source of income the two of you have, including any CPP and OAS benefits. Don't forget about tax refunds, cash from side jobs, insurance rebates, reimbursements from friends and family, PayPal payments, alimony or child support and any dividends or interest earned from your investments. We're not tabulating your assets, so leave out your car and home mortgage. Right now we're only concerned with your incoming cash flow. If it's liquid, jot it down.

90-DAY INPUT

Income/Salary (Net)_____

Child Support_____

Alimony_____

Bonuses/Winnings_____

Tax Returns/Credits_____

Interest Earned_____