

During negotiations, consultants should be prepared to justify their proposed terms, such as fee structures or timelines, by demonstrating their expertise, experience, and value to the engagement. On the other hand, clients may seek to negotiate more favourable terms based on their budget constraints, risk tolerance, or specific project requirements.

For instance, a client may propose a capped time and material contract to manage costs, while the consultant may counter with a fixed-price model to mitigate the risk of scope creep. Through open communication and a willingness to find common ground, both parties can reach an agreement that balances their respective needs and objectives.
