

8.5

Good Client vs. Bad Client:

Characteristics of Ideal Clients for Consulting Engagements

In the consulting world, not all clients are created equal. Some clients can be a pleasure to work with, fostering productive and mutually beneficial engagements, while others may present significant challenges that can drain resources and compromise project success.

As a consultant, it is crucial to distinguish between good and bad clients, understand the characteristics that define each, and develop strategies for navigating engagements with different clients.

Characteristics of Ideal Clients

Ideal clients align with your values, goals, and approach to consulting engagements. These clients typically exhibit the following characteristics:

Clear goals and objectives

They have a well-defined understanding of their needs, desired outcomes, and the purpose of the consulting engagement.

Openness to collaboration and expertise

They value your expertise and are open to your recommendations. They also actively participate in the process and provide necessary information and resources.

Commitment to the project

They fully invest in the engagement's success, allocating appropriate resources and ensuring stakeholder buy-in and support.

Respect for boundaries and agreements

They adhere to established timelines, budgets, and scope agreements and are receptive to discussions around scope changes or additional requests.

Ethical and professional conduct

They operate with integrity, transparency, and respect for legal and ethical standards.