Why Use Consulting Frameworks?

Frameworks are a good start to train your mind but using the already available frameworks for a client situation puts a question mark on the consultant's credibility. Here some creativity and thinking is needed to represent the problem. That is why consulting is both a science and art. Frameworks help in breaking the problem statement into actionable solutions

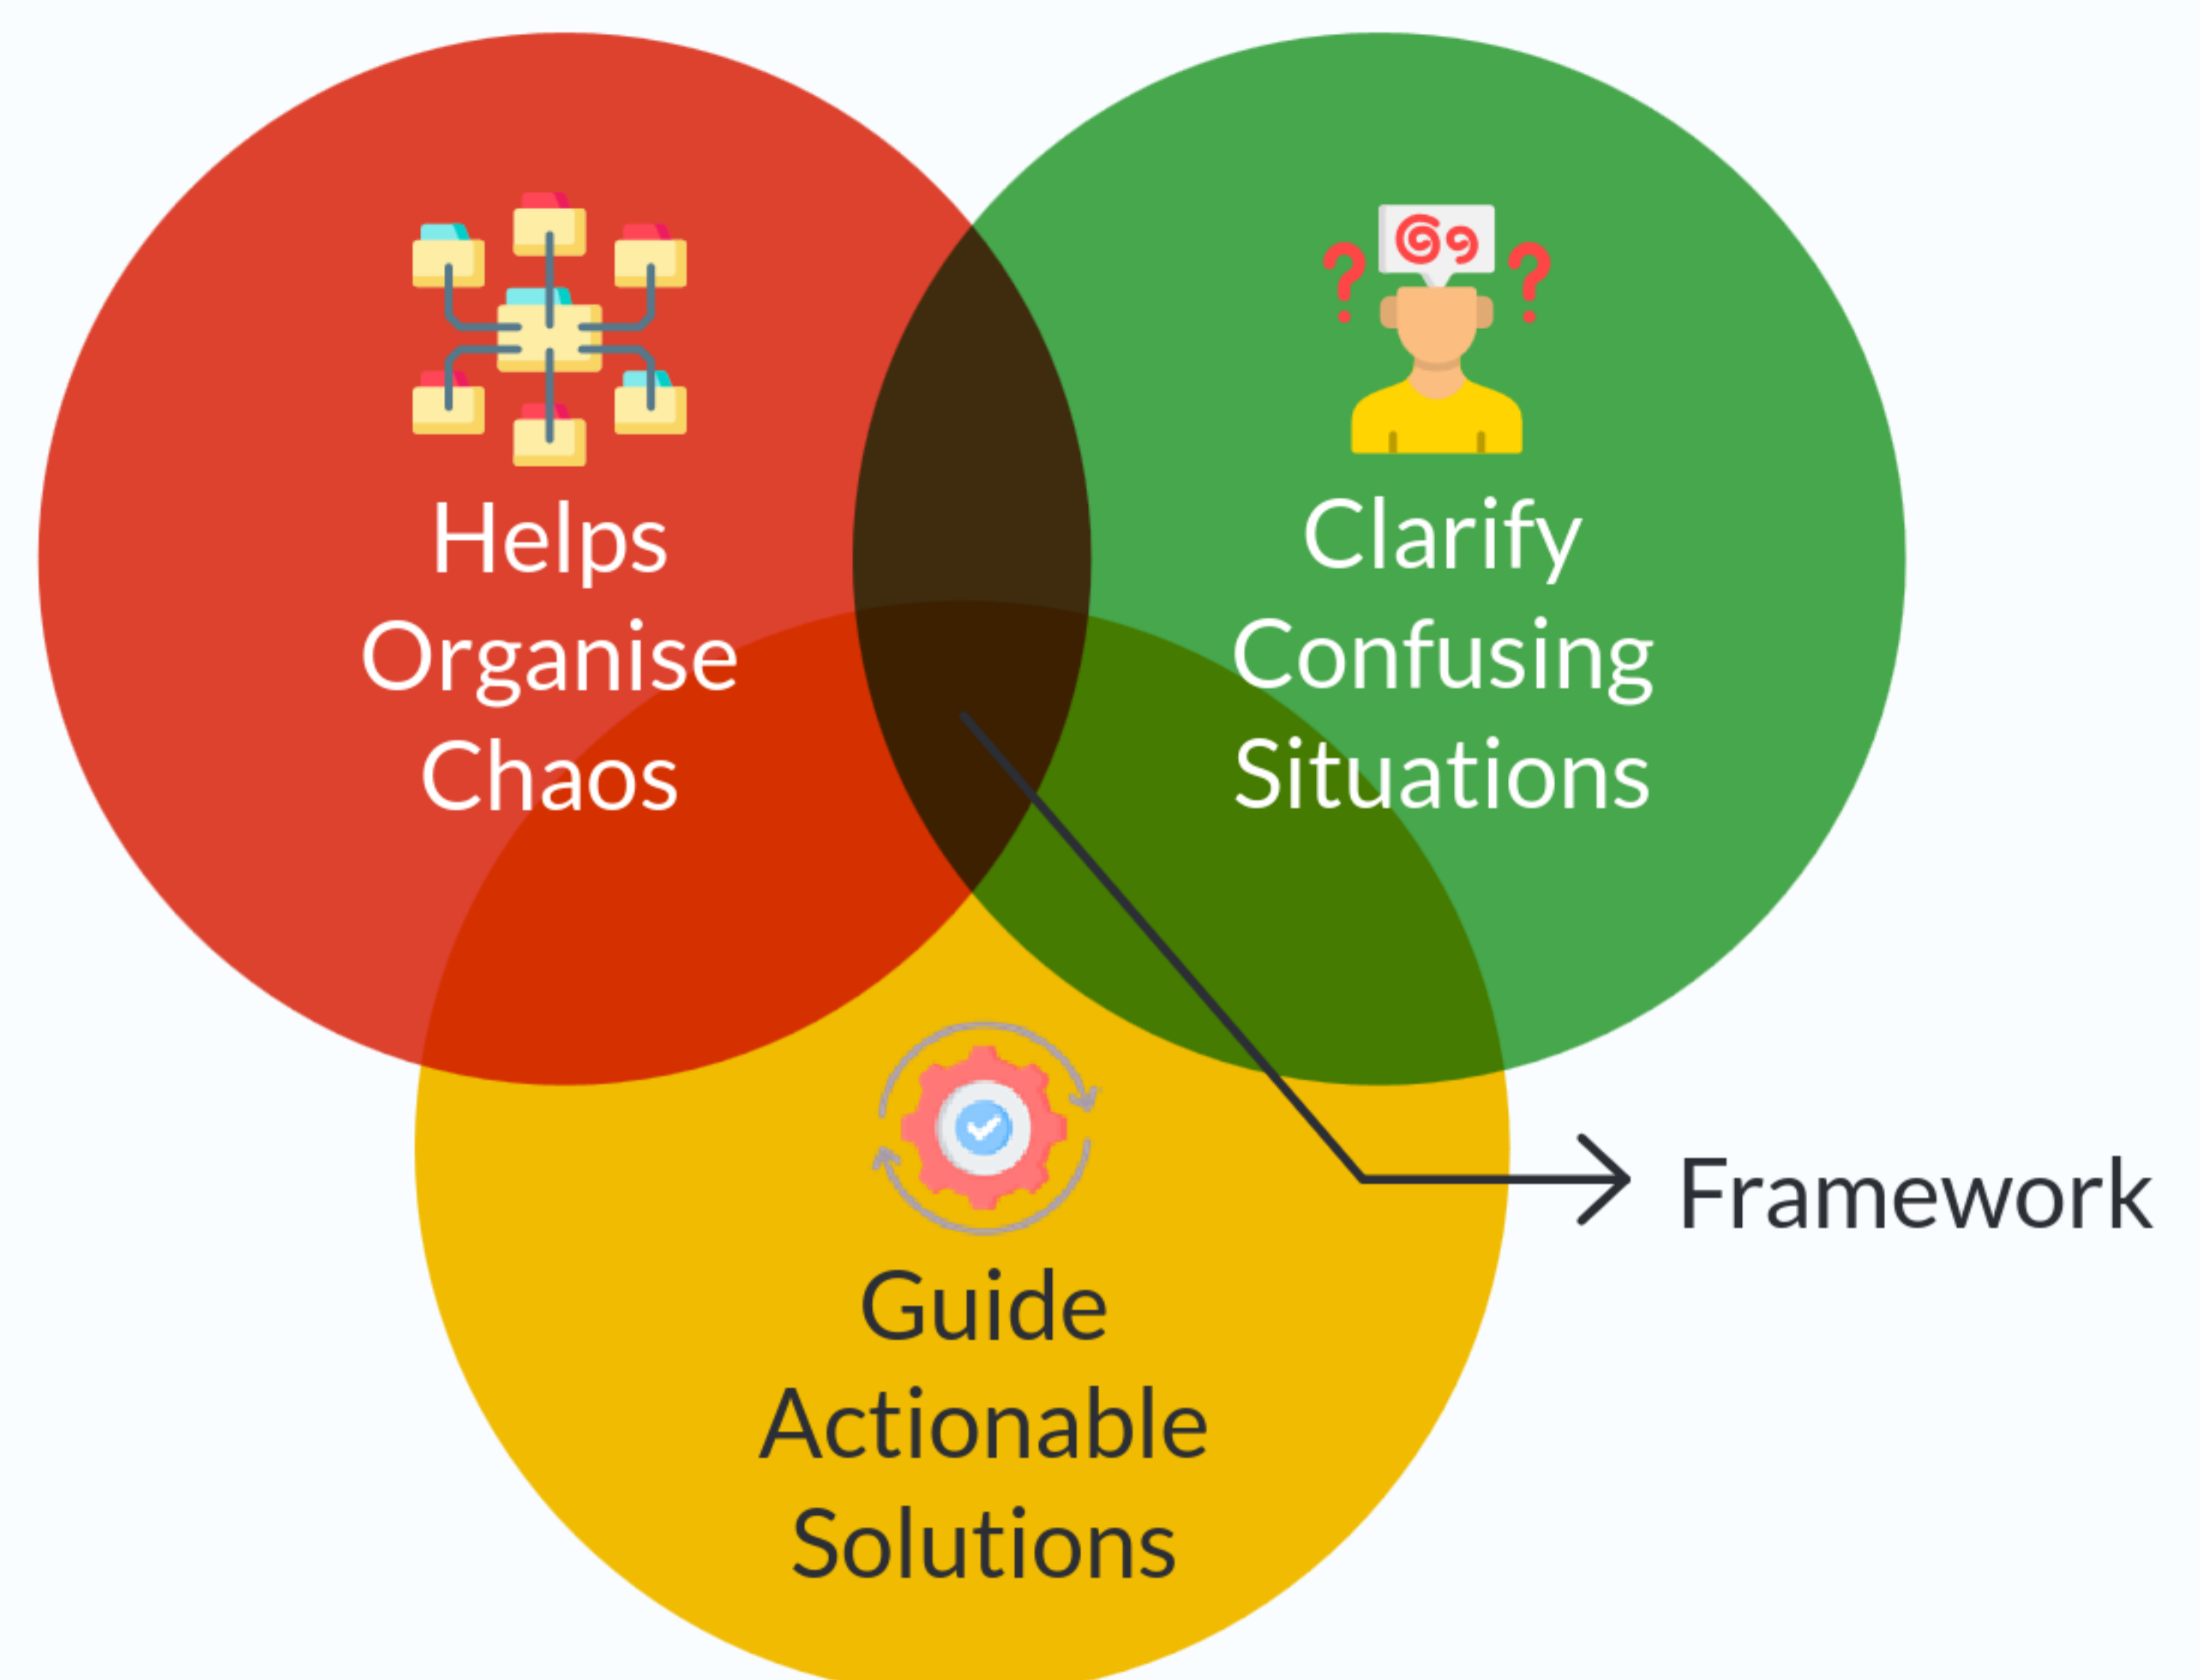

At the heart of every successful consulting project lies a fundamental question:

Why do we need frameworks?

The answer may seem straightforward, but it holds profound importance.

Frameworks help organise chaos, clarify confusing situations, and guide actionable solutions.

Warning ⚠

Consider a scenario, where clients often approach consultants with vague problems, uncertain about the causes or the best solutions. They might say things like “Our profits are dropping” or “Our operations aren’t efficient.”

Without a structured approach, these broad statements could lead consultants down a rabbit hole of endless data and countless possibilities, leaving them lost and unable to provide meaningful recommendations.
