

Step 3: Adapt and Customize the Framework

Once you’ve selected the appropriate framework, it’s time to tailor it to the client’s and the project’s specific needs.

This involves modifying certain elements, adding or removing components, or integrating complementary approaches to create a tailored solution.

For instance, if you’re using the BCG Matrix to evaluate a client’s product portfolio, you might add dimensions such as market attractiveness or competitive intensity to provide a more nuanced analysis.

Alternatively, you could combine the BCG Matrix with a framework like the GE-McKinsey Nine-Box Matrix, which incorporates factors like industry attractiveness and competitive strength.

Customisation also involves adapting the language and terminology used in the framework to align with the client’s industry or organisational culture. This ensures that the framework resonates with the client and facilitates effective communication throughout the engagement.
