

world where most people believe they could never become a millionaire, but they don't think twice about signing up for student loans. If someone only invested what they'd otherwise spend on student loan payments, they'd retire with millions. In some cases, the education someone thinks will make them rich is the very thing that puts millionaire status out of reach. This lesson was brought home to me in a recent interview my team did with a millionaire named Curtis.