

end of a long day, I used to love sitting back and just looking at the fields I had worked. I could see the progress and the payoff. I could tell exactly how my work made a difference that day. My fingerprints were all over that farm, and I was proud to contribute to its success.

My farming experience as a teenager made such an impact on me that I'm looking for farm jobs for my three sons this summer. They may not enjoy every aspect of all the hard work, but they're going to learn the value of a good day's work under the sun. They're going to learn what I—and the millionaires in our study—have learned: your commitment to hard work will shape the course of your life forever.
